A two-day's conference on Research in Analytical Psychology
on the 5th and 6th of November 2022 in:
"Kulturhuset Indre By", Charlotte Ammundsens Plads 3, 1359 København K.

Arne Vestergaard:

Socioanalytic approach to group supervision. A practical research project 2021-22.

Dea S. Stenbæk, Misser Berg og Christel Bormann:

Psilocybin induced numinous experiences in healthy humans. How can mandala drawings add positively to the description of the experience?

Christian Roesler:

Analytical Psychology has started with Jung's research on the complexes using the word association test..... Research designs are presented for future research in analytical psychology.

Socioanalytic approach to group supervision. A practical research project 2021-22.

Presentation and experiential work. The session builds on the experiences and results from a collaborative practical research project conducted in collaboration with a private company. The socioanalytic approach is informed by Jungian, socioanalytic, group analytic, complexity theory, neuropsychology and more. In particular, the socioanalytic approach to group supervision draws on well-established knowledge and decades of experience from social dreaming. The perspective for the theme of the day is that a socioanalytic approach to group supervision may be a step towards developing a collaborative, practical research method regarding Jungian psychoanalysis.

Arne Vestergaard is a psychologist, PhD, specialist, and supervisor in organizational psychology with 30+ years of experience. Since 2013, he has also worked as a Jungian analyst and psychotherapist with private practice in Copenhagen. He currently takes part in researching and developing a socioanalytic approach to group supervision and other group processes.

Psilocybin induced numinous experiences in healthy humans. How can mandala drawings add positively to the description of the experience?

Our cooperation started when Christel and Misser met Dea at a lecture, named "The brain under the influence of psilocybin and the psychedelic experience." Dea had shown the mandalas she in the study had asked the participants to draw after the psilocybin session, and Misser and Christel became interested in whether the mandalas can add positively to the description of the psychedelic experience. In the following we will discuss our process and the possible positive conclusions in relation to the use of mandalas in psychedelic research projects.

Misser Berg: Jungian analyst, lecturer, supervisor in private practice.

Christel Bormann: MD, Jungian analyst, lecturer and supervisor in private practice.

Dea S. Stenbæk: Assoc. Professor, Psychologist, Dept. of Neurology and Neurobiology Research Unit, Copenhagen University Hospital.

Research in analytical psychology.

Analytical Psychology has started with Jung's research on complexes using the word association test. In recent years it has become more important for analytical psychology to conduct research, since we will have to provide evidence in the future about the effectiveness of our method. But more important may be to better understand what goes on in depth over the course of psychotherapies. So an overview will be presented on research strategies, the findings regarding effectiveness of Jungian psychotherapy as well as psychodynamic therapies in general. On this background, research designs are presented for future research in analytical psychology.

Christian Roesler, Ph.D., Dipl.-Psych., is a Professor at the Clinical psychology at the Catholic University of Applied Sciences in Freiburg, Germany, and Lecturer of Analytical Psychology at the University of Basel, Switzerland. He is also a Jungian psychoanalyst in private practice in Freiburg and a member of the faculty of the C. G. Jungian Institutes in Stuttgart and Zürich.
